

Literary sponsorship is the the term used for acting as a pipeline for others to gain literacy in some way. Some common literary sponsors include schools, employers, media, etc. Literary sponsorship surrounds you in most aspects of life and help to shape the way you think and perceive the world. Through literary sponsorship, entities can benefit both themselves and society as sponsors "gain benefits from their success, whether by direct repayment or, indirectly, by credit of association" (Brandt 167). For instance, an insurance firm is a literary sponsor that allows employees to learn sales and communication skills, making money for the company and themselves.

Some major literary sponsors in my life are my parents, school, and my first job. My parents served as literary sponsors for me as they promoted reading growing up, allowing me to improve my writing and literary analysis skills. This evolved into them pushing me to work and achieve further education. They also pushed for me to get my first job at Publix, where I improved literacy sponsorship through extensive communication with customers. This job also provided me with the skills needed to read and understand planograms, delivery logs, and hour logs associated with the job. Finally, the primary literary sponsor in my life right now is the university as it allows me to further my education through extensive coursework. For instance, of course, this class serves as a literary sponsor as it provides me with a curriculum to further my literary knowledge. This is meant to prepare me for a more specialized education and eventually being able to solve problems in the workplace. Overall, literary sponsors are preparing you to be a free-thinking and earning member in society.

Brandt, Deborah. "Sponsors of Literacy." College Composition and Communication, vol. 49, no. 2, 1998, pp. 165–185.